

China and U.S. Failures

by kuang Thursday, Mar 20 2014, 8:23am

international / prose / post

The first thing we need to remember when dealing with these two superpowers is that China is a 3000 year old culture that heavily influenced other Asian cultures over that period of time -- so China knows a thing or two about survival and good international relations. The other critically important factor everyone who is interested in dealing with any Asian nation needs to know is that Asians approach everything obliquely, never head on -- direct confrontations are traditionally considered course, ignorant, rustic and grossly ill-mannered, so you get the picture. America attempts to solve its international problems with a gun while China approaches other nations with constructive solutions and non-violence, 'let's do business' to our mutual benefit! Who would you rather establish a relationship with? It is that simple, but the lunatic plutocrats that rule the USA have no idea how soft approaches/solutions work.

The American approach from the Asian perspective is about as gross, basic and course as you could get. However, it should also be noted that Asians are not alone in their view of the rustic violent USA, most of the civilised western world considers the world's leading civilian killing, thieving, plundering CRIMINAL nation to be extremely primitive or adolescent and unnecessarily violent -- "Fuck [the] EU!" Try not to forget that comment recently made by an American diplomat discussing the Ukraine intervention.

Prior to beginning this piece I had the feeling that it could be the shortest political piece I have ever written and indeed it could be. Here's why in a couple of extremely accurate paragraphs; the USA has been marauding around the world attempting to subdue other nations with force, intimidation and corruption -- and after fifteen years it is abundantly clear to everyone (except the plutocrats) that this approach has failed, note that I said FAILED not failing, cos its over for the USA. In the starkest possible contrast, China has been making incredible gains in the international arena by simply saying "let's do business," that will be mutually beneficial to both our nations.

China has made incredible gains over the past 30 years; most island nations in the Pacific and Indian Oceans have come under China's influence and of course Africa is a two thousand year old trading partner and relations remain strong today. However, China's most amazing successes have been in direct competition with the American corruption dollar in central Asia, which only goes into a few select pockets, whereas China's projects benefit the entire population/nation!

I need not continue as the core differences between both powers have been covered -- destructive and constructive approaches earn their own rewards.

<http://rt.com/op-edge/china-construction-economic-projects-342/>

Jungle Drum Prose/Poetry. <http://jungledrum.lingama.net/news/story-1062.html>