

The Real Powers of the World are Not Nation States

by rufuz Friday, Dec 19 2014, 11:59am

international / prose / post

It is true, nation states are merely the accessories of power elites.

With the advent of the digital revolution a new power elite established itself and existing criminal power elites were faced with a new challenge. Their methods rarely change, either brute oppression in the form of military interventions or police oppression sanctioned by draconian new laws that are legislated by puppet politicians to preserve an established power elite.

I need not go into depth regarding the methods of oppression and suppression that traditional power elites employ as history books are brimming with such information but new challenges require some analysis and few view the situation as is being outlined here.

The myth of States as independent entities

The USA is a perfect example of an elite core of British and some European power elites that wished to expand and EXPLOIT new regions. Consider that America was a British colony and that Britain was/is a State yet its army was defeated by Washington, not by superior force, tactics or resources but by the intrigues and machinations of the real power (Masonic) elite of Britain that required a break from the limiting structures of the British Empire in order to allow a wider range of freedoms not for the masses but for more dynamic money-making enterprises. Of course the criminal aspect is the slaughter of millions of what were and continue to be obstacles in the form of 'expendable' human beings such as indigenous people, opposing factions or people that simply obstruct or thwart expansionism.

Consider the real purpose of pan-surveillance today, which is designed to monitor the threat of digital elites whose ambition is not the accumulation of money or material wealth but knowledge, a most dangerous group for obvious reasons, as their anti-materialist values or ideology directly opposes the ideology of money worship, which is a cultural superimposition not a natural inclination of a social species, individualism, for example, is the result of cultural socialisation, a design intended to divide society into powerless single units. That design fails today as superior skill is able to be utilised by a single individual against the entire resources of a State.

However, criminal elements have today infiltrated and corrupted elements of this group and now some digital elites are concerned only with the appropriation of money or the accumulation wealth, this group poses no major threat to traditional elites as their pursuits are similar. Yet by instinct or reaction, the original core of elite hackers and their values not only remain but are continually expanding; it is this group that poses the most urgent threat to traditional, now antiquated, elites as they are easily able to intervene and subvert existing mechanisms and structures installed and maintained by traditional elites for the meaningless pursuit of material wealth.

Where it ends is obvious, materialist groups lack the skills of those dedicated to knowledge and the accumulation of newer more effective skills, this pursuit is both the means and end of this group. It is inevitable that this group will prevail and possibly, more than likely, alter the superimposed values of humanity.

An old adage applies today more than ever, 'knowledge is indeed power' and those that pursue knowledge are forever beyond the grasp of anything materialists are able to create to protect themselves -- the 'writing' or code, is on the (digital) wall.

Jungle Drum Prose/Poetry. <http://jungledrum.lingama.net/news/story-1395.html>