

The Simplest proves to be the most Difficult today

by stacey Tuesday, May 5 2015, 10:08am

international / prose / post

Why have the simplest and most effective social actions become difficult? Indeed an intriguing question which I am unable to effectively answer though one obvious culprit in the equation is a media or rather a propaganda neutered population.

The American alternative media is saturated with the usual moaning and groaning about the current situation in America and the world yet never provides solutions, which inaction or failure, supports the current status quo.

It is known that the most efficient way of removing a social model is to replace it with another and so America starves for solutions as no-one to my knowledge ever attempts to provide PRACTICAL answers.

So here's my response to the system that the alternative media moans and winces about but fails to remedy.

The answer is simplicity itself but the obvious and simple seem to escape the American mind today, notwithstanding this particular strategy escapes the collective mind of all western democracies. If you loath the model or system then simply cease supporting it in every way but especially at the polls. Replace owned major party politicians with representative independents as the UK population seems it's about to do. All major political systems rely on the support of the masses via work and ideological subscription, which is expressed in labouring for State and private enterprises/corporations. These entities would fail overnight if workers simply boycotted them - how fuckin' simple is that? No blood, guts, gung-ho, or viva la revolution, just plain withdrawing support and bingo no more corporate slavery/exploitation, debt slavery and outright theft from the major banks. However, where there is no solution there is no Will, and where there is no will there is no way, so action never eventuates and the masses remain subject to a now completely insane, destructive and suicidal system.

Until solutions are provided expect continued moaning and groaning and no action or the wrong actions, violent confrontations etc; nevertheless, the most effective strategy/action is the simplest of all but the rest of the formula is missing.

I would be overjoyed to hear from anyone that could address and help solve the current predicament, that of paralysed populations. No diagnoses are required, only remedies, as most commentators are aware of the problem/s, the tedious alternative media is saturated in descriptions and diagnoses.