Portrait

by drake Wednesday, Nov 22 2017, 9:18am international / poetry / post another mauve morning, saturday, flea market day at the old church, why not, perusing bric-a-brac may reduce the length of reduced mental focus and lingering hangover bumping and manoeuvring didn't help -- a stall of old wares, junk mostly, revealed a frame turned backward hiding a painting or photograph on request the vendor turned the frame about revealing the haunting face of a very young woman slightly in profile tho with eyes focused, it seemed, on the viewer, an illusion most portraits are known for, nevertheless, these eyes seemed to fixate the vision drawing the viewer into the picture -- if not for the eyes, the portrait would have been of a post pubescent girl but the eyes were too heavy with experience, intent, probing and knowing how much? ten dollars sold returning to the loft i hung it where once a picture adorned the wall leaving a tell-tale rectangular cleanliness; oddly the portrait frame fitted perfectly and so harmony was restored to the wall days passed into weeks the girl forever watching every movement, every event that transpired in the loft in which i spent most of my creative, debauched and restful hours yet my invited liaisons were disturbed by the portrait as the position of the bed forced a direct view; indeed, it was/is the eyes, which did not disturb me in the least years passed and many more short liaisons, the portrait was a saviour as no prospective partner lingered long enough to weave their particular spell, i often marvelled over this occurrence and smiled at the portrait unaware it responded ever so subtley years turned into decades during which time many literary pieces were produced and published, it was a living now approaching middle age i took the trouble to inspect the portrait closely; the eyes seemed painted by another artist so compelling they were, the colour of the eyes from a distance did not reflect the slate-bluegreen tinges which contrasted with a pale complexion i drew back a little then forward again fascinated by the change in the intensity of the gaze until like a lightning bolt to the brain i recalled/recognised the young woman in the portrait and a promise i failed to keep but not from this life i returned to my desk, emptied the glass of green ginger wine and began to type

Jungle Drum Prose/Poetry. http://jungledrum.lingama.net/news/story-3009.html