Temple

a small temple stands ivory white and majestic at the top surrounded by flowers and fruiting tress revealing itself momentarily through the mist and clouds but the only course to it was carved from the stone, steep incline not one step aligned with another they seemed carved, scattered laid out by madmen of great skill as tho the steps were fashioned by magicians as there was no safe footing other than the steps themselves people thronged at the bottom of the hill wishing to reach the temple but stood hesitant before the first step which was disproportionately large, so large in fact, that it required great effort to surmount it, yet there were hundreds more to negotiate, madly unaligned with each other despondents balked and didn't attempt to scale the very first step, resigning themselves to failure others made progress but became stranded on steps which were carved for that purpose few made it half way, while others watched hoping to gain some knowledge of an easy and safe route but none existed undaunted, i decided to reach the temple, learn its secret or die trying, and so my ordeal began every excruciating successful movement upward was won at huge cost in energy, physical pain and anguish of mind years passed during which time i had made it to the last slippery and scattered steps when it rained i drank from rainwater pools, which also served as washing basins, i was sustained by berries and fruits growing on the slippery slope until i reached the last 72 steps which i counted without undue further descriptions of the ordeal climbing those last steps i reached the summit and wondered how it was possible to build this exquisite temple atop this inhospitable hill, which had gained a reputation as the source of eternal life and the healing of every complaint of body, mind and soul and so i entered via a small sturdy door into the domed main room; a monk of indeterminable age greeted me with a knowing smile i asked the secret name of the temple, the monk responded, 'Life,' i could not resist asking, why the stepped path to the temple was so incongruous, treacherous and arduous, the monk responded, 'that's the nature of Life!'

he also advised that descent was impossible and i need not bother or attempt the impossible i looked up at the aperture in the domed ceiling which revealed an ultra-violet, other-worldly sky ...
