

The Pond

by reg Wednesday, May 2 2018, 12:26am international / poetry / post a natural pond in close proximity to the slums of Darlo adjacent to the SCG once thrived, few aware that the site was once a water catchment and swamp before it was drained as a sports and show ground early sydney settlers used it as a tip tho nothing toxic existed in those days and so a natural pond with rushes frogs, tadpoles and dragonflies flourished as a favourite place of play and adventure for slum kids that made rudimentary rafts and played pirates on on the Moore Park pond -- left to its nature through the middle and later decades of the 20th century huge figs and other trees surrounded the pond their buttressed sturdy branches making excellent climbing, very few televisions or the enslaving digital technologies of today existed then so kids grew closer to their wild independence, their abilities honed by wild and playful games in one of inner sydney's last vestiges of the natural i returned recently much older and experienced to witness its ruin, gone are the frogs, rushes and dragonflies it had been dredged and concreted a 'modern' metal sculpture set in concrete in the centre of now dead waters, the shore all bricked and concreted nice, neat and anal to the extreme lost is the vibrancy of natural life -- the scene devoid of playing children

fear, the 'modern' and anal, grip our cities today -- kids deprived of real play, adventure and natural learning play with enslaving digital devices, shaping their brains to accept slavery in modern sterile cities as a manageable, expendable, drone labour force -- modern cities now stand witness to the soul-less living dead

yet the wild survives deep in the psyches of men that plan wars and wanton destruction not appreciating that the destruction of civilisations becomes the victory of nature, which has no problem dealing with (modern) man's poisonous nature, which always succumbs to the subtle victories of the natural tho hidden and deep within so wage your wars, fools, and destroy your diseased civilisations, the now tamed majority offers no resistance, their complacency verifying yet again that nature remains victorious over all -- what drives perversity to suicide?

perverse man has failed to appreciate the seeds of its own destruction which nature implanted long before humans existed humans are and remain forever powerless before its awe and persistent harmony so, do your destructive best, you tragic, pathetic losers